4. Astron. A deviation from uniformity in the motion of a heavenly body.

The older astronomers reckoned four inequalities, two common to planets and the moon, and two confined to the moon. First Inequality: that which is due to the eccentricity of the orbit, and the acceleration of motion at a planet's perihelion or the moon's perigee. Second Inequality: that which arises from the obliquity of the direction of the planet's motion to the radius vector of its orbit; = Evection. Third Inequality: = Variation (of the moon). Fourth Inequality: that due to the more rapid motion of the moon when the earth is in perihelion; also called Annual Inequality or Annual Equation. Later astronomers have discovered several others, as Parallactic Inequality (see quot. 1867-76); Periodic Inequality, the comparatively short recurring orbital perturbation due to the attraction of another body, as the great inequality of Jupiter and Saturn.

1690 LAYBURN Curs. Math. 758 The second Inequality of the Moon is explained by a little Circle. 1726 tr. Gregory's Astron. I. 427 By any single observation of a Planet.. to clear it of its Second Inequality, and find its Distance from the Sun. 1728 PEMBERTON Newton's Philos. 228 Sir Isaac Newton has computed the very quantity of many of the moon's inequalities. 1816 PLAYFAIR *Nat. (ed. 3) 80 The Variation.. was the first lunar inequality explained by Sir I. Newton on the theory of gravitation. Ibid. The Parallactic Inequality arises from the sensible difference in the disturbing influence exerted by the Sun on the Moon, according as the latter is in that part of its orbit nearest to, or most removed from, the Sun. Ibid. The Secular Acceleration of the Moon's mean motion.. This inequality was detected by Halley in 1693. Ibid. 87 Hansen elucidated, a few years ago, two other inequalities in the Moon's motion, due, the one directly and the other indirectly, to the influence of Venus.

5. Math. a. The relation between quantities that are unequal in value or magnitude. Sign of inequality, either of the signs > ('is greater than') and < ('is less than'). b. An expression of this relation, consisting of two unequal quantities connected by either of these signs: distinguished from equation.

Inequi-, combining element, in sense 'unequal', 'unequally'; not of L. formation (the negative of L. æquus being iniquus), but f. IN-3 + EQUI-: usually in words that are the negatives of equi- words, as equidistant, inequidistant, but also forming negative compounds without corresponding positive forms. The following are examples of both classes:

Inequiaxial, Inequiaxial a. [AXE, AXIAL], having unequal axes. Inequicostrate a. [COSTATE], unequally ribbed, as a shell or seed (Mayne, 1855). Inequidistant a., not equidistant. Inequilibrium, want of equilibrium. Inequilobate, Inequilobed a., having unequal lobes. Inequipotentia, not equipotential; so Inequipotentia, inequality of potential, as at different points on the surface of a glacier.

Inference (infə'rens). [ad. med.L. inferentia (Abelard Univ. indd. ed. Cousin, 325, 328) (cf. It. inferenza 'an inference, an implying', Florio 1611), f. inferent-em, pr. pple. of inferre to INFER: used instead of cl.L. illatio.]

1. The action or process of inferring; the drawing of a conclusion from known or assumed facts or statements; esp. in Logic, the forming of a conclusion from data or premisses, either by inductive or deductive methods; reasoning from something known or assumed to something else which follows from it; = ILLATION. Also (with ph.), a particular act of inferring; the logical form in which this is expressed.

In English, the word appears first in the general sense, not as a term of formal Logic. In Logical treatises, it is found first applied to the deductive process of the syllogism, and its conclusion (mediate inference); its application to the inferring of a conclusion from a single proposition by conversion, opposition, permutation, or the like (immediate inference), and its use in the logic of induction (inductive inference) appear later, and are not accepted by all logicians. On the other hand, some restrict the term to induction, and deny that either a syllogism or an immediate inference can properly be called an inference.

The first of these is Conversion. 1843 MILL Logic II. i. § 3 Cases of inference in the proper acceptance of the term, those in which we set out from known truths, to arrive at others really distinct from them. Ibid. IV. i. § 2 In almost every act of our perceiving faculties, observation and inference are intimately blended. 1864 BOWEN Logic vi. 148 Inference or Reasoning is that act of Pure Thought whereby one Judgment is derived from another, or from two others. 1866 FOWLER Deduct. Logic III. i. (1869) 70 In any inference, we argue either to something already implied in the premisses or not: if the latter, the inference is inductive, if the former deductive. If the deductive inference contain only a single premiss, it is immediate; if it contain two premisses, and the conclusion be drawn from these jointly, it is mediate, and is called a syllogism. 1874 STUBBS Const. Hist. I. i. 2 This... is not a matter of inference. It is a recorded fact of history.

G. LATHAM Native Races Russian Emp. 109 The belief was, probably, inferential. 1885 G. ALLEN Darwin viii. 137 Minute inferential proofs which hardly admit of deliberate condensation.

Infiniteness. Now rare. [f. as prec. + -NESS.]

The quality or condition of being infinite; infinitude, infinity. a. Boundlessness, illimitableness.

b. Indefiniteness of amount or number; usually in hyperbolic sense: The state of being exceedingly great or numerous; immensity, vastness; immense quantity or number.

Infinitesimal (infinitesimal), sb. and a. Also erron. -ess-. [f. mod.L. infinitesim-us, f. L. infinit-us (cf. cent-esimus hundredth, mill-esimus thousandth); cf. F. infinitésime (1752 in Dict. Trévoux), infinitésimal (1762 in Dict. Acad.).

The form, of the mod.L. word shows that it was orig. meant as an ordinal, viz. the 'infiniteth' in order, that which is at an infinite distance from the first; but the ordinals are also used to name fractions, e.g. hundredth (part), $\frac{1}{100}$, thousandth (part) $\frac{1}{1000}$; hence, infinitesimal pars, infinitesimal part or infinitesimal, came to mean unity divided by infinity, $(\frac{1}{\infty})$, and thus an infinitely small part or quantity. Although essentially an adj., our earliest example shows the word used absolutely as a sb.

A. sb. (or absolutely.)

2. (Chiefly Math.) As a fraction or fractional quantity. The inverse or reciprocal of an infinite quantity; †an infinitely small fraction or part of anything (obs.). Hence b. (Math.) An infinitely small quantity or amount, a quantity less than any assignable quantity.

Chiefly used of the infinitesimal differences or differentials treated of in the differential and integral calculus: see DIFFERENTIAL A. 3. B. 1 a. Mathematicians distinguish different orders of infinitesimals; thus, if we make x infinite, $\frac{1}{x}$ is an infinitesimal of the first order, $\frac{1}{x^2}$ (being infinitely less than $\frac{1}{x}$) an infinitesimal of the second order, and so on.

1. Gram. The name of that form of a verb which expresses simply the notion of the verb without predicating it of any subject. Usually classed as a 'mood', though strictly a substantive with certain verbal functions, esp. those of governing an object, and being qualified by an adverb.

(Called by Quintilian and Priscian infinitus modus, by Diomedes infinitivus 'because it has not definite persons and numbers, whence it has also been called by some, impersonalivus and insignativus'. In the short grammar of Dionysius Thrax (B.C. 80), it is called ἀπαρέμφατος, i.e. without modification of sense, unmodified.)

In modern Eng., the infinitive has the simple uninflected form of the verb; agreeing in this respect with the imperative, and (except in the verb be), with the first pers. sing., and the whole plural, of the present indicative. In OE., the infinitive had (in the nom.-acc. case) the suffix -an,

ME. -en, -e; it had also a dative form in -anne, ME. -enne, -ene, -en, -e. The latter is sometimes fancifully called by modern grammarians, the gerundial or gerundive infinitive, as answering in some of its functions to the Latin gerund or gerundive. (It answers more to the L. supine.) The OE. nom.-acc. infinitive is the source of the (now less frequent) simple infinitive, as in 'we saw him come', 'they need not come'. The dative-infinitive is formally the source of the infinitive with to, and functionally the origin of this in such uses as 'he went to see the fight' ('infinitive of purpose'), 'it was easy to see' ('adverbial infinitive'), but to is now prefixed also to the nom.-acc. infinitive, where OE. had the simple form in -an, as in 'to see is to believe', 'he likes to see it'. See To prep.

Inflex, sb. [ad. L. inflexus (u-stem), synonymous with inflexio INFLEXION.] In the grammar of the Bantu languages, the particle prefixed to a root, to form a noun, which has functions similar to those of inflexional suffixes in the Aryan and Semitic languages. (Also called prefix or initial.) 1859 COLENSO First Steps Zulu-Kafir ii. 4 Every Zulu noun consists of two parts, the root and the inflex, the latter being a small particle, which is set before the root, forming with it the complete noun... We give the name of inflex to this initial particle, because, by changes of it, certain modifications of the noun are effected, as they are in Latin and Greek; by means of terminal particles... Thus... in the Zulu word umuntu, person, the root is ntu, and the inflex umu, which is changed to aba for the plural, and the whole word becomes abantu, people.

Influenza (influen'zā). [a. It. influenza, lit. 'influence' = med. L. influentia: see INFLUENCE.]

It. influenza has the various senses of Eng. influence; but has, besides, developed (app. from the notion of 'astral' or 'occult influence') that of 'visitation' or 'outbreak' of any epidemic disease which assails many people at the same time and place (e.g. influenza di catarro, influenza di febbre scarlatina), a sense known as early as 1594; hence, absolutely, 'an epidemic'; in 1743 applied specifically to 'the epidemic' (called also la grippe) which then raged in Italy, and spread over Europe generally, and for which the Italian word (anglicized in pronunciation) became the English specific name.]

A specific febrile zymotic disorder, highly contagious, and occurring for the most part in widespread epidemics. Its symptoms and sequelæ are extremely variable, but generally include rapid prostration and severe catarrh. The mortality is not high in proportion to the numbers attacked.

The term has been also applied loosely to any severe catarrh of the respiratory mucous membrane, esp. to a 'cold in the head' with running at the nose, sometimes called an influenza-cold. This use was frequent in the interval between the epidemic of 1847-8, and that which began in 1889, during which period no true influenza visited Great Britain.

5. spec. in Eng. Law. a. A complaint or charge against a person lodged with or presented to a court or magistrate, in order to the institution of criminal proceedings without formal indictment.

The original object of this procedure was to dispense with the previous finding of a grand jury. Criminal informations are laid (a) in any criminal court, partly at suit of the Crown, partly at suit of an individual, to enforce a penalty under a penal statute (the penalty being paid partly to the use of the Crown, partly to the informer); (b) in the Queen's Bench Division, in the name of the Crown alone, being either ex officio informations for misdemeanours dangerous to the government, e. g. seditious libel, or informations filed by the Master of the Crown Office, on the complaint of a private individual, for gross misdemeanours; (c) before a Justice of Peace, in matters that may be dealt with summarily, being a statement of the facts by the prosecutor, verbally or in writing, with or without oath. Most of these uses exist also in the law of the United States, where the most common sense is 'An official criminal charge presented, usually, by the prosecuting officers of the state, without the interposition of a grand jury'.

Infourme, infowrme, obs. ff. INFORM v.

Infra- (infrá), prefix, repr. L. infrá adv. and prep. 'below, underneath, beneath' (in med. L. also 'within'), used in numerous recent formations, chiefly adjectival.

This use of infra- is scarcely a Latin one, though infráforánu 'situated beneath the forum' occurs in an inscription (Lewis and Short), and infrámaránu 'lying within the walls' in Gregory of Tours (Du Cange). Its recent employment is after the analogy of other prepositions; it is regularly opposed to supra-, sometimes to super-: the second element ought strictly to be one of Latin origin; but it is not always so.

A. In prepositional relation to the sb. represented in second element.

1. Denoting 'below', 'beneath' (i.e. 'lower down than') in respect of local situation or position. Chiefly in terms which are the adjectival representatives of phrases in which L. infrá would be followed by a sb. in the accusative, e.g. infraxillary 'that is infrá axillam, below the axilla or armpit'; inframammary, 'that is infrá mammās, below the breasts'. The majority of these are anatomical terms. In a few cases the second element appears to be a sb., as infraclavicle. More rarely infra- is simply prefixed to an adj., as inframedian, infra-red.

2. Denoting 'below', 'beneath' in respect of status or condition, as infrabestial 'lower than bestial', 'beneath the brutes'. In these, infra- seems to be directly prefixed to an adjective.

3. Denoting 'within' (as in med. L.), as inframercurial, territorial (see these words below): here the formation is as in 1.

B. In attributive or adverbial relation to the second element: 'lower', 'inferior', 'under-', as infracarotid, infraposition, etc.

Such compounds can be formed at will when required; the following are the principal ones in use. For the etymology of the second element see the simple words AXILLARY, BESTIAL, CORTICAL, etc.

In most of these compounds, practice varies as to the use of the hyphen; the hyphen is usual when the compound is new, or more or less of a nonce-word, e.g. infra-red, infrakuman, infra-natural; but it is usually omitted in recognized terms, as inframaxillary, infracapular, except when the following element begins with a vowel, as in infraxillary, infra-inguinal, infra-orbital. It may however be used for the nonce, whenever emphasis is placed either on the prefix, or on the composite character of the word.

Infralapsarian (infrælæpsærian), sb. and a. Theol. [f. L. infrā under, beneath + laps-us fall + -arian, as in Trinitarian, etc.]

A. sb. A term applied in the 17th c. to Calvinists holding the view that God's election of some to everlasting life was consequent to his prescience of the Fall of man, or that it contemplated man as already fallen, and was thus a remedial measure: opposed to SUPRALAPSARIAN.

The Supralapsarian view makes Predestination anterior or logically superior to the Fall, and views the creation, fall, and saving of some, as parts of God's eternal purpose. Infralapsarian is generally used as synonymous with SUBLAPSARIAN, the earlier and, in English writers, the more usual term. But some distinguish the two, associating Sublapsarian with the view that the Fall was foreseen, and Infralapsarian with the view that it was permitted, by God.

1731 in BAILEY vol. II. 1756 in BROUGHTON Hist. Dict. of Relig. 1775 ASH, Infralapsarian s., one who holds that God in the decree of election considered his people as fallen in Adam; a sublapsarian. 1843 J. B. ROBERTSON tr. Möckler's Symbolism II. 345 The parties of Supralapsarians and Infralapsarians already stood opposed to each other. 1865 W. G. T. SHEDD Christ. Doctrine II. 192 According to the Infralapsarians, the decree to create men, and that they shall apostatize, are prior to that of election and reprobation. Election supposes apostasy as a fact.

B. adj. Of or pertaining to the Infralapsarians or their doctrine.

1775 ASH, Infralapsarian adj., Belonging to the scheme or doctrine of the Infralapsarians. 1860 GARDNER Faiths of World II. 135/1 Hagenbach alleges that the synod of Dort approved of the Infralapsarian scheme. 1865 W. G. T. SHEDD Christ. Doctrine II. 192 Beza . . had adopted the infralapsarian statement of the doctrine of predestination, which renders the doctrine more austere and repelling than the infralapsarian representation.

Hence Infralapsarianism, the doctrine of Infralapsarians.

1847 BUCH tr. Hagenbach's Hist. Doct. II. 255. 1865 W. G. T. SHEDD Christ. Doctrine II. 193 The Synod of Dort favoured Infralapsarianism, in opposition to Gomar, who endeavoured to commit the Synod to Supralapsarianism.

A class of Protozoa, comprising ciliated, tentaculate, and flagellate animalcula, essentially unicellular, free-swimming, or sedentary; so called because found in infusions of decaying animal or vegetable matter.

Originally, as constituted by O. F. Müller, the Infusoria comprehended an assemblage of minute, usually microscopic, organisms, of many diverse kinds, including some now classed as vegetables, as the Diatomaceæ and the Desmidiaceæ. As now limited, the Infusoria are Protozoa characterized by a half-liquid endosarc, a firm cortical ectosarc, an outer membranous cuticle, a mouth and anus, and a contractile vesicle which injects fluid. They were regarded by Huxley as a primary group in the animal kingdom.

-ing, suffix forming verbal derivatives, originally abstract nouns of action, but subsequently developed in various directions: OE. -ung, -ing = OFris. -unge, -enge, -inge, OS. -unga (MLG. and MDu. -inge, Du. -ing), OHG. -unga, -ung (MHG. -unge, Ger. -ung), ON. -ung and -ing; not known in Gothic: -O'Leut. type uygā* and ? ingā* str. fem.; not identified outside I'entonic. In OE. the more usual form was -ung (inflected -unge), but -ing also was frequent, esp. in derivatives from original ja-verbs (see Cosijn, Altwests. Gramm. II. 21, 22). In early ME., -ung rapidly died out, being scarcely found after 1250, and -ing (in early ME. -inge) became the regular form. In later ME., -yng was a frequent scribal variant.

1. The original function of the suffix was to form nouns of action; as dcung ASKING, from dcian to ask, bliding, boding preaching, BODING, claping, -ing CHEATING, cliding, -ung CHIDING, creopung CREEPING, ebbing EBBING, feeding FEEDING, gaderung GATHERING. These substantives were originally abstract; but even in OE. they often came to express a completed action, a process, habit, or art, as lelsung, -ing BLESSING, leornung LEARNING, tidung TIDINGS, wedding betrothal, WEDDING, and then admitted a plural; sometimes they became concrete, as in bedding, eardung dwelling, offring OFFERING, rynnung rennet, EARNING. During the ME. period all these uses received greater development, and in the 14th c. the formation became established, esp. in the gerundial use (see 2 below), as an actual or possible derivative of every verb. By later extension, formations of the same kind have been analogically made from substantives (see c, g, below), and, by ellipsis, from adverbs, as innings, offing, outing, homing (home-coming); while nonce-words in -ing are formed freely on words or phrases of many kinds, e.g. oh-ing, hear-hearing, hoo-hooing, pshawing, yo-hoing (calling oh!, hear! hear!, etc.), howd-yedding (saying 'how do you do?'); 'I do not believe in all this finling' (having pints of beer).

In current use, verbal substantives in -ing may be grouped, as to their sense, under the following heads:

a. Nouns of continuous action or existence, as crying, falling, flying, kicking, living, pushing, running, sleeping, speaking, striking, etc. They are distinguished from verbal sbbs. of the same form as the verb-stem, as a cry, a fall, a kick, a push, a run, a shout, a sleep, etc., in that the latter denote acts of momentary or short duration, having a definite beginning and end, and grammatically take a and plural, while the sbbs. in -ing imply indefinite duration without reference to beginning or end, and take no plural. Cf. 'a loud cry', 'many repeated cries', with 'loud and continued crying'. A push is done at once, but may be repeated as many pushes; pushing is continuous, there may be 'much', but not 'many' of it.

b. The notion of action may be limited to that of a single or particular occasion, as a christening, a wedding, a meeting, a sitting, a merry-making, an outing. As thus used, the sb. takes a plural: 'three long sittings'.

c. The notion of simple action passes insensibly into that of a process, practice, habit, or art, which may or may not be regarded as in actual exercise; e.g. 'reading and writing are now common acquisitions'; so drawing, engraving, fencing, smoking, swimming. Words of this kind are also formed directly from sbbs. which are the names of things used, or persons engaged, in the action: such are ballooning, blackberrying, canalling, chambering, cocking (cock-fighting), fowling, gardening, hopping (hop-picking), hurting (gathering hurts), nooning, nutting, sniping, buccaneering, costering, soldiering, and the like.

d. Hence often transferred to the concrete or material accompaniment or product of the action or process, as 'the paper was covered with writing'; so binding, blacking, dripping, dubbing, lightning, sewing, stitching, etc.

e. Hence as the designation of a material thing in which the action or its result is concreted or embodied; as 'a writing was affixed to the wall'; so a covering, holding, landing, shaving, winding (of a river), etc. A peculiar instance is a being, one wherein the attribute of being or existence is exemplified, now usually a living being.

f. Often used as the collective designation of the substance or material employed in an action or process, as clothing, that with which one is clothed; so bedding, carpeting, ceiling, edging, flooring, gearing, gliding, honing, lining, rigging, roofing, shipping, tackling, tiling, trimming, etc.

g. In the preceding group, there is often a sb. of the same form as the verb, with which the noun in -ing comes to be closely associated, as in bed, bedding; clothes, clothing; floor, flooring; rail, railing; ship, shipping, etc. Hence arise formations in -ing from substantives without a corresponding verb; esp. in industrial and commercial language, with the sense of a collection or indefinite mass of the thing or of its material; as ashlaring, coping, cornering, costering, girdering, piping, scaffolding, tubing; bagging, quilting, sacking, sheeting, shirting, ticking, trousering.

h. In some words the concrete sense appears exclusively, or preferentially, in the plural -ings: e.g. earnings, leavings, sweepings, tidings; hangings, innings, moorings, trappings.

Other exceptional or irregular uses of -ing are discussed under the individual words.

The vbl. sb. in -ing often forms the second element in a compound. The first element may be a qualifying adv. which in the finite tenses of the vb. formerly stood either before or after it, but in the vbl. sbbs. and adjs. regularly preceded, and thus came to be united with these: thus, from out go or go out came out going, now out-going or outgoing. So down-sitting, in-being, in-dwelling, off-scoring, up-rising, well-being. The first element may also be a sb., the direct, indirect, or adverbial object of the verb, as book-keeping, child-bearing, glass-blowing, house-keeping, sheep-shearing, sea-faring, hand-writing, type-writing, or merely a subjective genitive, as cock-crowing, sun-rising.

The vbl. sb. often stands in an attributive relation to another sb., as in the building trade = the trade of building, drawing materials = materials for drawing, singing lessons = lessons in singing; when such expressions form established designations, they are regularly hyphenated, and pronounced with the stress on the first element, as in breeding-place, carving-knife, dancing-master, duelling-house, fowling-piece, laughing-stock, meeting-house, reaping-hook, stumbling-block, spinning-wheel, thanksgiving-day, turning-lathe, walking-stick, etc. But, when the collocation is only occasional, and the vbl. sb. stands in a simple attributive relation to the following sb., it approaches in function to an adjective, and is liable to be confounded with the pres. pple. (-ING) used adjectivally. The sense generally determines the nature of the collocation; thus, drawing lessons are not lessons that draw, but lessons in drawing; a fainting fit, not a fit that faints, but a fit of fainting; a drinking cup, not a cup that drinks, but a cup for drinking with. A walking-leaf is a leaf (so-called) that walks; a walking-stick is a stick for walking. But in some cases in which the second element denotes a machine, agency, or agent, it is difficult to say whether the word in -ing is the vbl. sb. used attributively, or the present pple. used adjectivally, e.g. a cutting tool, a bursting charge, an advertising agency. In accordance with general analogy, such combinations are, as a rule, treated in this dictionary as attrib. uses of the vbl. sb.

2. The most notable development of the vbl. sb. in -ing is its use as a gerund, i.e. a substantive with certain verbal functions, particularly those of being qualified by an adverb instead of an adjective, and of governing an object like a verb: e.g. the habit of speaking loosely (= loose speaking); he has hopes of coming back speedily (= a speedy return); he practises writing (= the writing of) leading articles; engaged in building himself a house (= the building of a house for himself); after having written a letter (= the completion of the writing of a letter).

This gerundial use is peculiar to English, of which it is a characteristic and most important feature; it was unknown to OE. and early ME.

The first traces of it as yet pointed out (see R. Blume Ursprung und Entwicklung des Gerundiums im Englischen, Bremen 1880) occur c 1340 in the Aenbite of Inwit and in the writings of Richard Rolle of Hampole, in the separation of the adv. in downcoming, downfalling, ingoining, etc., and the placing of it after the vbl. sb., coming down, falling down, going in, as in the finite verb, come down, fall down, go in. This was soon extended to adverbs and adverbial phrases generally, so that it became established that any vbl. sb. could, like the vb. to which it belonged, take an adverbial qualification. In other respects the vbl. sb. at first retained its sb. construction, e.g. c 1350 HAMPOLE Prose Tr. (E. E. T. S.) 11 'all manere of withdrawynge of oþer men thynges wrangwysly agaynes þaire wyll þat aghte it'.

A generation later, the vbl. sb. is found with a verbal regimen, thus 1377 LANGLAND P. Pl. B. xiv. 186 'Confessioun and knowlechynge and crauynge by mercy Shulde amende vs'; Ibid. xix. 72 'with-onten mercy askynge'. This gerundial construction is very frequent in Wyclif's Bible (1382); and it is significant that he regularly uses it in translating the Latin gerund, while he retains the original substantival construction in rendering a Latin n. of action. Thus, Exod. xix. 1 'the thridde moneth of the goynge of Yrael out [egressuynge] of the loond of Egipte'; but Heb. xii. 10 'in receyuyng [receptiende] the halowing of him'; Mark iii. 15 'power of heelynge [curandi] sickness, and of castynge out [ejiciendi] fendis'. Imitation of the L. gerund was thus app. an influential factor in the development of the Eng. gerundial use of the vbl. sb. Another influence may have been the literal rendering of the Fr. gerund (identical in form with the pr. pple.) after en, as in en venant, L. in veniendo, in coming.

The full development of the gerundial use before 1400 led necessarily to an indefinite increase of vbl. sbbs. in -ing, since every verb now had one as an actual or potential dependant. In conjunction with the formal identity of gerund and pres. pple. (see -ING), it led also, at a later date, to the introduction of gerundial expressions for the perfect and future tenses, and for the passive voice, coinciding in form with the pples. of the same tenses and voices. Thus SIDNEY Arcadia i. (1729) 68 'want of consideration in not having demanded this much'; SPENSER F. Q. iii. iv. 50 'fear of being lowly shent'; HOOKER Eccle. Pol. i. xi. § 2 'by being unto God united'; SHAKS. Two Gent. i. iii. 16 'in having knowne no trouble in his youth'; Tempest iii. i. 19 'I will weep for having married you'; Mod. 'The news of his being about to return home, instead of having been slain by the enemy'.

But, although the gerundial use was fully established by 1400, it was a long time before it was distinctly separated from the earlier substantival use. The vbl. sb. has the (or equivalent) before it, and of (or equivalent) after it; the gerund has neither. A good example of the two constructions side by side, and with identical sense, occurs in Bacon's third Essay: 'Concerning the Meanes of procuring Unity: Men must beware, that in the procuring . . of Religious Unity, they do not', etc. But, down to the 17th c., mixed constructions were frequent, in which the word in -ing had an adjectival qualification with a verbal regimen, or, conversely, an adverbial qualification with the construction of a sb. followed by of: thus SIDNEY Arcadia i. iv. 15 b, 'to fall to a sodain straitning them'; Ibid. i. xii. 56 b, 'by the well choosing of your commandements'.

The gerund still retains one feature of the vbl. sb., viz. that of admitting of a preceding possessive case or possessive pronoun, as in 'after John's behaving so strangely', 'upon my readily granting it'. In the literary language this construction is regularly retained with a pronoun, and very generally with a single personal substantive; but, with names of things, and phraseological or involved denominations, the sign of the possessive began to be dropped already by 1600; thus SHAKS. Macbeth i. iii. 44 'By each at once her choppie finger laying Upon her skinnie lips'. No other treatment is now possible in such constructions as 'in default of one or other being accepted', 'on the general and his staff appearing', 'in the event of your expectations not being at once realized', 'in consequence of much snow having fallen'; and, in current spoken English, the 's is commonly omitted with all nouns: thus THACKERAY Van. Fair xi. § 48 'I insist upon Miss Sharp appearing', where 'Miss Sharp's' would now sound pedantic or archaic. Even a pronoun standing before the gerund is put in the objective, in dialect speech; and, when the pronoun is emphatic, this is common in ordinary colloquial English: thus THACKERAY Esmond i. 242 'Papa did not care about them learning'; — Newcomes 'But who ever heard of them eating an owl!'; CHAS. READE Hard Cash (1863) II. 332 'That is no excuse for him beating you.' So 'What is the use of me speaking?'

In such constructions the objective sb. or pronoun seems to stand in simple apposition to the gerund, the two forming a kind of combined object of the preposition, reminding us of the Greek infinitive with an accusative after a prep., as in μετὰ τὸ ἀπαδοῦναι τὸν ἑλάνην, 'after John being delivered up'. But in Eng. there has probably been analogical influence from the construction of the pres. pple.: cf., for instance, 'John was digging potatoes', 'Who saw John digging potatoes?', and 'Who ever heard of John (= John's) digging potatoes?'

3. In a few ME. writers, esp. in Wyclif, the form in -inge, -ynge, also appears for the Dative Infinitive, OE. -enne, ME. -ene, -en. Thus Luke xlii. 23 'who it was of hem that was to doynge [facturus] this thing.' John vi. 72 'this was to hitraynge [traditurus] him.' In its origin this is a case of phonetic confusion; the OE. -enne, conformed with -ende, had, like the pres. pple. (see -ING 2), passed through -inde to -inge, -ynge.

But it is possible that Wyclif, in using this form to render the L. future participle, actually identified it in sense with the gerund, understanding the first quotation above as if = 'who it was of them that was [destined] to the doing of this thing', which he contracted to the gerundial construction 'to doynge this thing'.

-ing², suffix of the present participle, and of adjs. thence derived, or so formed; an alteration of the original OE. -ende = OFris. -and, OHG. -ant-i (-ent-i, -ont-i, MHG. -ende, Ger. -end), ON. -and-i (Sw. -ande, Da. -ende), Goth. -and-s, -and-a = L. -ent, Gr. -ovt-, Skr. -ant-.

Already, in later OE., the ppl. -ende was often weakened to -inde, and this became the regular Southern form of the ending in Early ME. From the end of the 12th c. there was a growing tendency to confuse -inde, phonetically or scribally, with -inge; this confusion is specially noticeable in MSS. written by Anglo-Norman scribes in the 13th c. The final result was the predominance of the form -inge, and its general substitution for -inde in the 14th c., although in some works, as the Kentish Ayenbite of 1340, the ppl. still regularly has -inde. In Midland English -ende is frequent in Gower, and occasional in Midland writers for some time later; but the southern -inge, -ynge, -ing, favoured by Chaucer, Hoccleve, and Lydgate, soon spread over the Midland area, and became the Standard English form. The Northern dialect, on the other hand, in England and Scotland, retained the earlier ending in the form -ande, -and, strongly contrasted with the verbal sb. in -yng, -ing (-yne, -ene). At the present day the two are completely distinct in Northumberland and the Southern Counties of Scotland, although the general mutescence of final d, and the change of -iy to -in, make the difference in most cases only a vowel one: e.g. 'a singan burd', 'the singin (-in) o' the burds', but 'a gaan bairn' (a going child), 'afore gangin' hame'.

As -inge was the proper ending of the vbl. sb. (-ING¹), it has naturally suggested itself to many that the levelling of the pres. pple. under the same form must have been the result of some contact or confusion of the functions or constructions of the two formations. But investigation has discovered no trace of any such functional or constructional contact in Early ME.; and it is now generally agreed that the confusion was, in its origin, entirely phonetic. On the other hand, the fact that the forms had, by the 14th c., become identical, may have been a factor in the development of the gerundial use of the vbl. sb., which began then; and it has certainly influenced the subsequent development of the compound gerundial forms being made, having made, having been made, being about to go, etc., which have the same form as the corresponding participles (see -ING¹ 2). The identity of form of pr. pple. and gerund probably also assisted the process whereby, at a later date, such a construction as 'the king went a-hunting', formerly 'on or an huntinge', was shortened to 'the king went hunting', the last word being then taken as the participle; and thus to the shortening of 'the ark was a-building', orig. 'on building', to 'the ark was building',—in which, if 'building' is taken as a pple., it must be explained as a pple. passive = being built. To the same cause must be ascribed some of the current constructions of the gerund, and the tendency of the vbl. sb. when used attributively to run together with the pr. pple. used adjectivally, as in cutting tools, a driving wheel (see -ING¹ 1).

The termination -ing is that of the pres. pple., whether used as part of the verb, or adjectivally; also of adjectives of participial origin or nature, as cunning, willing, daring, buccaneering, freebooting, non-juring, hulking, lumping, strapping, swingeing, and of prepositions or adverbs of participial origin, as concerning, during, excepting, notwithstanding, pending, touching.

As with the vbl. sb. (-ING¹), words of participial form and use may be formed on other parts of speech, or on phrases, e.g. buccaneering adventurers, sailors yo-hoing lustily, how-doing acquaintances.

-ing³, a suffix forming derivative masculine sbs., with the sense of 'one belonging to' or 'of the kind of', hence 'one possessed of the quality of', and also as a patronymic = 'one descended from, a son of', and as a diminutive. Found in the same form, or as -ung, in the other Teutonic langs. OE. examples are apeling ATHELING, cynning KING, lytling little one, child, flyming fugitive, horing whoremonger; also the patronymics Æpelwulfing son of Æthelwulf, Ecgbrehting, Cerdicing, Woden-ing, etc. (OE. Ingot (ingŏt). Also 4-6 yngot. [Of uncertain origin. Occurs in Chaucer in sense 1; then not till the second half of the 16th c. in sense 2 (though sense 1 is also used in 16-18th c.). [Note. F. lingot is held by some French etymologists to be adopted from Eng., with coalescence of the article, for lingot. The origin of a term of alchemy (as this evidently was) in Eng., is not a priori probable. Also, the only recorded sense of F. lingot (which appears frequently in 15th-16th c.) is = our sense 2, while the English ingot before 1558 is known only from Chaucer in sense 1: this makes a difficulty, unless it is assumed that sense 2 was also in English during these two centuries, though not yet found. Those who assume an Eng. origin suggest a derivation (not unapt as regards the sense) from in adv., and goten, ancient pa. pple. of OE. gōtan, ME. goten, zeten, zheten, mod. dial. yett to pour, to cast (metal). Here there is the difficulty that the pa. pple. goten was conformed to the rest of the vb., as zeten, zheten, zeten, before the 14th c.; the hard g might perh. have been retained in an old compound, as in the derivative gote, 'water-course, gutter, drain', but even in that case we should have expected an original final vowel, giving ME. ingote. The existing evidence is thus too contradictory for any certain conclusion.]

Kennett conjectures for hoc, hok, the sense of Du. hoek (MDu. and MLG. hōk) 'corner, angle'; but this is not otherwise evidenced in ME. second element is app. OE. hōc 'hook', in same sense.] A term applied in Middle English times to a piece of land (temporarily) inclosed from the fallow and put under cultivation; an inclosure (of this description).

See, as to the use of the term, Vinogradoff Villainage in England (1892) 226-8, Kennett Paroch. Antiq. Glossary s.v. Kennett's explanation is 'any corner or out-part of a common field ploughed up and sowed (and sometimes fenced off) within that year wherein the rest of the same field lay fallow. It is now called... in Oxfordshire a hitching.' But the notion of a corner or out-part appears to have no other foundation than Kennett's conjectured derivation.

Inhuman (inhū'mān), a. (sb.) Forms: 5 inhuman, 6-7 inhumane, -aine, 7- inhuman. [ad. L. inhūmān-us, f. in- (IN-3) + hūmānus HUMAN. In earliest examples app. after F. inhumain, -aine (15th c. in Hatz.-Darm.).]

The stress was originally, as in F., on the final syllable, but by the close of the 16th c. metrical evidence shows the distinction of inhuman and inhumane in verse, though without apparent distinction of meaning. The prose pronunciation was then probably inhuman, but the spelling inhumane was almost invariable till after 1700 (cf. HUMAN, HUMANE). After the spelling inhuman came in, the spelling and pronunciation inhumane became app. very rare. Bailey (after 1730), Johnson, and other 18th c. dictionaries which distinguish human and humane in pronunciation and sense, recognize for the negative only inhuman, and Todd 1818 appears not to have known inhumane, for he says 'There is now no distinction observed between inhuman and inhumane: formerly it was inhumane with the accent on the last syllable'. Ash 1775 distinguishes 'inhū'mān, barbarous, cruel, void of compassion', and 'inhū'māne, void of tenderness, unkind (But not much used)'. The second entry may refer only to the 17th c. word. None of the 19th c. dictionaries, until quite recently, record inhumane (exc. as an obsolete form of inhuman). It may therefore be concluded that inhumane in current use has been formed afresh on humane, in order to provide an exact negative to the latter, and thus a word of milder meaning than inhuman. (In treating the two words, we place under INHUMAN all quot. bef. 1600 however spelt, all 17th c. metrical quot. which show the stress on hū', and all 17th c. or later examples spelt inhuman.)

2. Law. A judicial process by which one who is threatening to invade or has invaded the legal or equitable rights of another is restrained from commencing or continuing such wrongful act, or is commanded to restore matters to the position in which they stood previously to his action.

Injunctions were formerly obtained by writ, but now by a judgement or order. They were originally granted only by the Court of Chancery: commonly, to stay one party to an action from continuing that action, if there was an equitable, though not a legal defence thereto. By the Judicature Act of 1873, all divisions of the High Court received full power to grant injunctions. According to their purpose, injunctions are either restrictive (restraining) or mandatory; as to their force, they are either interlocutory (provisional, temporary, ad interim), or perpetual (permanent). (In Sc. Law, the equivalent of a restrictive injunction is an INTERDICT.)

-in-law. [f. IN prep. + LAW sb.] A phrase appended to names of relationship, as father, mother, brother, sister, son, etc., to indicate that the relationship is not by nature, but in the eye of the Canon Law, with reference to the degrees of affinity within which marriage is prohibited. These forms can be traced back to the 14th c.: see BROTHER-IN-LAW. Formerly -in-law was also used to designate those relationships which are now expressed by step-, e.g. son-in-law = step-son, father-in-law = step-father; this, though still locally or vulgarly current, is now generally considered a misuse.

Mag.* Jan. 24 The position of the 'in-laws' (a happy phrase which is attributed . . . to her Majesty, than whom no one can be better acquainted with the article) is often not very apt to promote happiness. 1898 Daily News 7 Jan. 4/7 'Don't live with them'—with the 'in-laws'. 1898 *Westm. b. Inns of Chancery: certain houses or sets of buildings in London, originally places of residence and study for students and apprentices of law; also the societies by which they were occupied.

From the 15th or 16th to the 18th c., these were subordinate to the Inns of Court; but they now perform no public function, though several still exist as societies possessing corporate property, the chambers being occupied by solicitors and others.

Intro. §. 1. 26 note, The inns of chancery are, Clifford's Inn, Clement's Inn, Lion's Inn, New Inn, Furnival's Inn, Thavies' Inn, Staple's Inn, and Barnard's Inn. These are subordinate to the inns of court; the three first belong to the Inner Temple, the fourth to the Middle Temple, the two next to Lincoln's Inn, and the two last to Gray's Inn. 1833 Wharton's Law Lex. (ed. 7), Inns of Chancery . . these were formerly preparatory colleges for students, and many entered them before they were admitted into the Inns of Court. They [now] consist chiefly of solicitors, and possess corporate property, hall, chambers, etc., but perform no public functions like the Inns of Court.

c. Inns of Court: the four sets of buildings in London (the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn) belonging to the four legal societies which have the exclusive right of admitting persons to practise at the bar, and hold a course of instruction and examination for that purpose; hence, these four societies themselves. (Formerly also colloq. inns a court.)

The distinction of the 'four principal Innes' of law as Inns of Court, was fully established in the 15th c.: see quot. a1485 in b. But in earlier times, and sometimes later, the name Inns of Court, or its equivalent, seems to have included both the hospitia majora and hospitia minora: cf. quot. 1355, 1458, and 1580 (referring to the same event) in b, with 1548 and 1597 here.

buildings . . situate in Chancery Lane, Fleet Street, and Holborn. The last, called Scroop's Inn, has long been abandoned, and since the burning down of Serjeants' Inn, Fleet Street . . the serjeants . . have now no other building than Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, which has been lately rebuilt. Ibid., In Serjeants' Inn Hall the judges and serjeants, as members of the Society of Serjeants' Inn, dine together during term-time. 1877 Law Journal 3 Mar. 117 Serjeants' Inn was sold on Friday, February 23, for 57,000l., to Mr. Serjeant Cox . . The determination of the judges and serjeants to sell the ancient home of a moribund order was not taken lightly or of mere caprice. . . We ought to consider that places like Serjeants' Inn have now no sort of practical utility.

Some of the Inns of Chancery and of Court derive their specific names from those of noblemen or persons of quality, whose residence or property they formerly were, and from whom they were at first often rented. It has hence been sometimes assumed that the term inn here meant originally 'the town-house or residence' of such nobleman or gentleman, e. g. that 'Lincoln's Inn' meant originally 'the Earl of Lincoln's town-house': but there is no evidence that inn ever had any such specific sense (as distinct from its general sense of 'habitation, lodging, house', sense 1), and no proof that any of these houses bore the name hospitium or inn, until it was actually the hospitium or hostel of a body of students.

† Inne, adv. and prep. Obs. Forms: a. 1-2 innan, 2-3 innen, (2 inna). β. 1-5 inne, (4-5 ynne). 'from within', but in late OE. there remained little or no distinction between innan and inne as adverbs; the main difference being that inne was only an adv., while innan was both adv. and prep. A few examples of innan as prep. are found in 12th c.; and innen adv. occurs in Hatton Gospels and Layamon. Inna prep. in Lamb. Hom. may be an error for innan or inne. But the ordinary early ME. form for both adv. and prep. was inne, frequent in Southern writings of 12-14th c. It is very rare in the Kentish of Shoreham and the Aeyenbite, in which the prep. is regularly ine. In northern works, from Cursor Mundi onwards, and in Midland works after the time when final e became mute, inne (ynne) appears to be merely an occasional spelling of in.]

Faith* iv. ii. § 5. 221 In the inorganic world we observe action and reaction. 1889 A. R. WALLACE Darwinism 17 There is a yet deadlier enemy in the forces of inorganic nature.

b. Chem. Of elements, compounds, etc.: Not entering into the composition of organized bodies; not formed under the action of the vital forces.

The inorganic elements are those which may be obtained by the processes of chemistry from minerals as well as organized bodies. 1832 T. THOMSON Chem. Org. Bodies 628 Acids, in general, whether organic or inorganic... act upon sugar in the same manner when assisted by heat. 1864 CARLYLE Fredk. Gl. xvi. i. c. Inorganic Chemistry, that branch of Chemistry which investigates inorganic compounds; the chemistry of mineral substances.

As all organized bodies contain carbon, Organic Chemistry is usually defined as 'the chemistry of the carbon compounds', while Inorganic Chemistry comprises that of all the other elements and their combinations.

[182. T. THOMSON (title), A System of Chemistry of Inorganic Bodies. Cited in Penny Cycl. (1837) VII. 31/2 as Inorganic Chemistry.] 1847 CRAIG S. Feminine words* which in Old English ended in a consonant often took in Middle English an inorganic -e (derived from the oblique cases), as in OE. gāhnes, ME. gāhnesse, and all nouns in -nes.

(MHG. insigle, -gil, Ger. insiegel), ON. insigili (Da. insigeli), all str. neut. Cf. also (without in-) Goth. sigilo wk. neut., MHG. sigel, Ger. sigel, MDn. zeghel, Du. zegel.

The stem of the word evidently represents L. sigillum 'little sign, figure, or token, seal' (dim. of L. signum 'sign, mark, token'), whence OF. seel, Eng. SEAL; but the origin of the prefix in- in the Teutonic forms is obscure, since no late or med.L. insigillum appears. Franck (Etym. Woorden-bk. Nederl. t. s. v. Zegel) suggests that it may have been taken over in some way from L. insigne 'mark, sign', used also in med.L. in sense 'seal'. In the verb, the prefix raises less difficulty; a med.L. insigillare actually occurs (though sometimes as a rendering of OE. inseglian), and enseeler is common in OF. (see ENSRAL v.).

A seal; app. orig. the impression made in wax with which a letter, etc. is sealed; also the signet or engraved instrument with which the impression is made.
